Professional Experience

Thomas' practice encompasses a wide range of creditors' rights law and business transactions. His creditors' rights experience includes representation of financial institutions, lenders, community associations, and other creditors in collections and bankruptcy proceedings, as well as navigating commercial loan transactions and workouts. Thomas routinely represents creditors in commercial litigation, in addition to drafting complex loan and settlement documentation.

In his business practice, Thomas frequently assists clients on a variety of issues including stock and asset purchase transactions, the formation of new business entities, and drafting and negotiating contracts. A portion of Thomas' practice also focuses on representing planned community associations with a broad range of legal issues, including establishing and enforcing collection policies.

Prior to completing law school, Thomas worked for Ward and Smith in the Creditors' Rights practice section for seven years.
